The building at 511 East 43rd Street is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places as a contributing resource in the surrounding district. The largely residential area is located just off the heavily commercial York Road corridor between Waverly and Govans is characterized by an irregular street plan and a wide variety of middle and working class housing types. The area is representative of Baltimore's early suburban development. Located outside the city until 1918, the suburban character of the area is reflected in the prevalence of single-family houses set on small lots. The area apparently developed slowly, from perhaps the 1870s through the 1940s, as shown in its houses ranging from frame gable front houses to blocky brick rowhouses of the 1940s. East 43rd Street is characterized by larger and more architecturally distinguished buildings than the surrounding streets and includes several large shingle style houses, a stone church and manse, and the building at 511 East 43rd Street.

The building at 511 East 43rd Street was appears to have been designed as an apartment building and some attempt was made to relate the design to the surrounding single-family residential character of the neighborhood. Now stuccoed, the building was originally clad in clapboards, like several neighboring houses. The height was kept to three stories and mass broken up by projecting bays, an addition-like, rear section and a complex roof line. In addition, the building was sited on a large lot.

Although heavily damaged by fire and water, the building still contributes to the district in terms of location, design and setting.
